Adult King Salmon— For King Salmon Brood Stock

JUNEAU Department of Fish and Game biologists have captured 19 adult king salmon at Laku Inlet and transported them live to Petersburg where they will be used to start a king salmon brood stock at the Crystal Lake hatchery.

Rupert Andrews, director of the sport fish division of the Department of Fish and Game, said that the project marked the first effort by the department to transplant mature salmon directly from salt water to fresh water for artificial spawning.

"Development of a stable source for king salmon eggs is a top priority because of expanding commercial and sport fisheries enhancement projects," Andrews said.

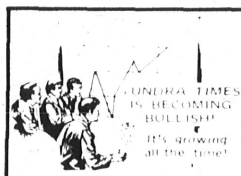

"We are seeking sources within Alaska because of the infectious viral diseases present in salmon in other states. These diseases could be introduced into Alaskan stocks through imported eggs or fish," he added.

Andrews also noted that department biologists believe that native fish are better adapted to Alaskan waters and therefore survive better when stocked.

"Since this project is very experimental, there are many factors, such as freshwater disease, which could jeopardize its success," Andrews said.

The 19 kings were captured in a small mesh gillnet by sport fish biologist Paul Kissner and game technician Paul Brian. They were transported to Petersburg on the vessel Standust.

The king salmon will be held in a fresh water pond at the Crystal Lake hatchery until they are ready for spawning. The eggs will be incubated at the hatchery and the fish will be released when they reach smolt size.
