

In 1963 we drilled where the caribou roam.

And we're both still here today.

When arctic drilling first began, there were many questions and concerns about the arctic lands and wildlife.

And rightfully so.

In many cases the oil companies themselves raised these questions and funded studies.

And today, we have many of the answers.

After years of drilling, there has been no appreciable harm to the arctic environment.

None.

Today, the caribou are here in greater numbers than before drilling began.

And we're still producing oil and protecting the arctic environment.

A success story we're proud of.

AOGA

Alaska Oil & Gas Association

Carefully Developing Tomorrow's Resources.