A PUBLIC REVIEW OF PROPOSED FEDERAL UNDERGROUND STORAGE TANK REGULATIONS

The Environmental Protection Agency, (EPA), in conjunction with the Alaska Department of Environmental Conservation (DEC), is sponsoring a workshop and slide presentation to explain EPA's recently proposed regulations for underground storage tanks. Workshops are scheduled in Anchorage on Wednesday, May 6, from 6:30 p.m. to 8:00 p.m. at Alaska Pacific University, Atwood Center, and in Fairbanks on Thursday, May 7, from 6:30 p.m. to 8:00 p.m. at the Noel Wein Library Auditorium.

EPA's new regulations outline requirements for testers, installers and owners of underground storage tanks containing petroleum and other hazardous substances. These new proposals include requirements for new tanks, as well as tanks already in the ground, and cover design and construction, leak detection, and proper installation and tank closure methods. The new guidelines highlight the need for tank owners and operators to carry insurance or other financial responsibility to pay for cleaning up leaks. Provisions also allow DEC to coordinate an underground storage tank program in lieu of federal regulation and enforcement by EPA.
