

Wallace Asks Good, Solid Questions of Rep. Hensley

Rep. William L. "Willie" Hensley, Kotzebue Democrat Eskimo legislator, was kept busy for two days last week in Kotzebue by the Columbia Broadcasting System team of Mike Wallace and Paul Lowenwater who are filming on the theme of Alaska native land claims in Alaska.

Wallace and Lowenwater were alerted to the land claims matter after reading about the land troubles of Chief Andrew Isaac and his people in the Tanacross area in the Tundra Times.

"We came up here to get the story of the oil strike but we have found other interesting subjects going on in Alaska," Lowenwater told Tundra Times recently. "For instance the story about Chief Isaac of Tanacross and the native land problems."

Lowenwater inquired whether Chief Andrew Isaac would be able to face up to a strong personality like Mike Wallace, who is famed for his point blank type and searching questions in his CBS program.

He was told that Chief Isaac would be more than able to do so as he was a strong and positive leader of his people and that his only drawback would be his inability to talk smoothly in English but that he was well able to put his points across nevertheless.

After a previous visit to Tanacross, the CBS team again visited the village last Sunday to film more scenes of Chief Isaac and his people.

"They were in Kotzebue for two whole days and Mike Wallace asked me some good, solid questions," said Rep. Hensley.
