Peratrovich said that besides the new home for Gump, BCS is also working on preparing land in downtown Bethel for offices, developing 7 acres for additional housing units, and hopes to perhaps expand the use of high quality housing by making greater use of Imperial's approach.

Point Hope . . .

Some Pt. Hope residents suspect leftover radioactive material from Project Chariot experiments is the most likely source of the cancer problem. Even after the cleanup of the Chariot site in 1993, the vast majority of radioactive material brought to the site has never been accounted for, according to borough officials. Borough Mayor George Ahmaogak said he would like to see local people have more control over future research efforts.

Local residents have begun to participate in the research loop, according to NSB spokesman David Harding. After the Chariot revelations, a borough-sponsored committee of scientists recommended installation of an air monitoring station at the village to track any changes in radiation levels. The U.S. Dept. of Energy agreed to fund the equipment and earlier this month, technicians from the Los Alamos National Laboratory installed a monitoring device at the Pt. Hope City Hall. Residents will operate the equipment and data will appear on a local computer at the same time it is transmitted to Los Alamos for evaluation.
