

Runners Throughout U.S. are Legging it to Alaska's Centennial

Runners throughout the United States are "running to Alaska" as a part of the Centennial year celebration marking one hundred years since the purchase of Alaska from Russia in 1867.

These runners are logging the miles they run daily; they need to log 1640 miles between November 1, 1966, and December 31, 1967, to complete the journey from Dawson Creek, British Columbia, to Anchorage, Alaska, during centennial year. Runners who have not begun this project should begin immediately.

Once the necessary mileage is run, the runner should send a signed statement of this fact to the Physical Education Coordinator at Alaska Methodist University in Anchorage. An award for completing the run will then be sent to the runner.

Mr. Jim Brown, director of the project at Alaska Methodist University, is making the run himself, and recently passed through Fort St. John, nearing the end of the pavement. His guide to the route is the Alaska Highway guide book, THE MILEPOST.
