Recent biological information about the Western Arctic Caribou herd indicates the herd's well being has improved sufficiently to justify a controlled bulls-only harvest, Department biologists report. Final results from the 1969 photo count indicated a known 1976 minimum population of 64,000 caribou and preliminary data from 1977 suggest the population now numbers approximately 75,000.

Bishop stressed that recovery of the herd looks promising if humans do not kill any females from the herd. Any human kill of a female caribou from the herd will jeopardize recovery of the herd and delay by many years the time before humans can substantially increase their annual harvest.
