

Most days you'll find us in the middle of nowhere.

In the air, over land and sea, North Pacific Expediting, a subsidiary of Klukwan, Inc., delivers the support services you need to keep the job going. Thanks to a sophisticated computer based network, we are able to locate and move parts and materials across the street or across the country with unequaled ease. We learned the ropes by expediting items as diverse as large tractors, small engine parts and food supplies to remote logging operations in Southeast Alaska, where fair weather and paved roads are about as common as snow in July.

Today we are applying that knowledge to mining, construction and oil operations throughout the Pacific Northwest. When we say we pick up and deliver, we mean it.

Meet the board. . .

Perry Eaton, president and chief executive officer of Community Enterprise Development Corp., believes education is the key issue facing the Alaska Native community. And he says he's serving as vice chairman of the Tundra Times Board of Directors because he believes the newspaper can help focus attention on the issue.

Eaton said he is also concerned about the Native community finding ways to balance priorities between traditional and Western cultures.

"Baselines have to be drawn," he said. "People need to be able to read and write well, and we have to protect our values and the focus on families. We can't compromise either way."

Eaton is a Koniag Inc. shareholder and lives in Anchorage with his wife, Ardene. The couple has two children.
