

FAA Advises Pilots on Fuel

The Federal Aviation Administration recommends that pilots determine in advance if sufficient fuel supplies are available at their destination before making any crosscountry flights.

Their attention is drawn to a recent announcement by Governor Egan that the state administration "is doing all it can to alleviate reported fuel shortages."

"Be sure to include availability of fuel at your destination in your flight planning," recommends an FAA spokesman.