

Sealaska president resigns

JUNEAU — Sealaska Corp. announced recently that William M. Howe, president and chief operating officer, will be leaving the corporation effective April 1.

"Bill Howe submitted his voluntary resignation at the February board meeting," said Byron L. Mallott, Sealaska's chief executive officer.

"Because of the changing strategic direction of Sealaska, the divestiture and liquidation of major subsidiary units and the reduction in timber operations, Bill felt that we needed to restructure and reduce our executive management as it relates to business operations," Mallott said.

Howe has been the president and chief operating officer of Sealaska since December 1985. He joined Sealaska in 1984 as vice president finance and chief financial officer. Prior to joining Sealaska, he served as vice president and Alaska group manager and other positions with Security Pacific Bank in Seattle.
