schools to meet the present regulations.

Concerning the 2(c) study, a study done concerning section 2(c) of the Alaska Native Claims Act that reviewed existing federal programs and the Alaska Natives, Thompson commented that the study was completed and reviewed by Congress but as of yet nothing emanate has come out of it.

He added that the Indian Policy Review Commission established by Congress is investigating Indian Programs and their task forces will report to Congress in July. By the end of the year the commission will submit a report with recommendations to Congress.

Thompson sees the future of BIA in Alaska as a tool using a different delivery mechanism. "We will allow regional management and conduct."

He went on to say that many of the previously BIA-operated programs are now being locally controlled.

whom are Athabascan like Frank.

When Frank testified he explained he knew moose-hunting season was closed but it was expected moose meat would be found for the 200-300 people who would congregate at Minto to eat together and honor the dead man at the potlatch.

"I don't feel I've done anything wrong," said Frank. "I would do it again if there were no meat; to show respect."

Prosecutor Richard J. Ray has questioned how essential fresh moose meat is to potlatch, and nobody has produced documentation that it is, despite evidence that fresh meat has been used since ancient times.

Mrs. Barbara Lane, an anthropologist from Victoria, B.C., testified for the defense that moose is the staff of life for Athabascans and the lack of written documentation that the meat be fresh should be interpreted as such accepted practice that it is taken for granted.

The court proceedings finished last Thursday after four days in Fairbanks District Court. The case deals with what is legally called a case of free impression, meaning the issue has not been addressed in court since Alaska statehood and, apparently never before anywhere else in the nation.

What wound up Thursday is called an evidentiary hearing at which both sides present evidence on the motion to dismiss the charge against Frank before the case goes to trial.

Defense lawyers Wagstaff and Middleton will prepare a written statement of their case as will prosecutor Ray and Judge Monroe N. Clayton will mull them over before asking for oral arguments in the matter. His decision is not expected for about four months.

Either side is expected to appeal the outcome of Judge Clayton's decision.
