U.S. to Award Angoon $90,000-

Award Pays for Shelling Village 91 Years Ago

By MARILYN RICHARDS

The Angoon Tribe of Admiralty Island will be awarded $90,000 from the United States for some wrong doings against them by the government's armed forces over 91 years ago.

The reparation for the suit, which was filed with the Indian Claims Commission and the U.S. Claims Commission ended a five-year legal battle.

Tundra Times first broke the story of Angoon's long grief and first legal actions in the Oct. 18, 1968 issue. John Borbridge, then president of the Tlingit and Haida Central Council, explained the suit to us. "This is an old wrong which has long grieved the members of the Tribe. By this suit, the Angoon Tribe will seek to obtain to light the true facts concerning this incident, and to obtain redress under the Indian Claims Commission Act which authorized claims based on old wrongs."

The suit stated on Oct. 26, 1882, the U.S. Naval forces "without justification and in violation of law, deliberately and with malice shelled and set fire to the village of Angoon and burned a neighboring camp, destroying houses, canoes and other property owned by the Angoon Tribe."

Copies of government documents in possession of the Central Council provided an official account of the incident.

A member of the Angoon Tribe was on the crew of a Northwest Trading Co. whaling boat. In the course of discharging a bomb at a whale the bomb exploded killing the Angoon tribe member.

"In accordance with its well established tribal laws, the Angoons demanded 200 blankets from the owners of the whaling boat as reparation for the death of the Angoon tribal member," stated Borbridge.

"The company refused to pay. The Angoons thereupon seized several boats and equipment belonging to the company along with two white crew members as security for payment of the reparation."

As a result of this action, the Northwest Trading Co. complained to the commanding officer of the USS Adams at Sitka who then dispatched several armed vessels to Angoon Harbor.

The Angoons then released the two men and returned the boats and equipment. The Naval commanding officer demanded that the Angoons pay the United States 400 blankets which they refused to do.

To punish the Angoons, the officer ordered some 40 canoes seized and destroyed and the Angoon summer camp burned. The Naval vessels then shelled the village of Angoon, landed, and burned it.

"As a sidelight of this shocking incident, that was touched off by a very ancient law of the natives: namely to require the payment of reparation for even accidental injuries. This native law, in a sense, foreshadowed and was the basis for the later and now well established American system of laws requiring payment of workmen's compensation when an employee is accidentally injured or killed. Thus, precisely because their tribal law was many years in advance of American social legislation, but their defenses were much inferior to the guns of the U.S. Navy, the Angoons suffered destruction of their village and camp and canoes.

"Only now has the American conscience recognized at long last some reparation might be made, not for the long-dead crewman but for a cruel and unjustified injury to the Angoon Tribe," said Borbridge in 1968 which is still true today.

Mail Delivery Speeded Up

A new system to improve overnight delivery of airmail and first class mail between Anchorage and Fairbanks was initiated Oct. 24.

Ivan Hanson, district manager for Alaska, agreed with the need to improve service between Alaska's two largest cities during recent Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee hearings held in Alaska.

Special blue and gold collection boxes will be located at the main airport facilities and at the downtown federal stations in both Anchorage and Fairbanks.

Mail for Fairbanks only and for Anchorage only can be deposited in these collection boxes in Anchorage and Fairbanks respectively.

Mail deposited in either city by 5 p.m. will be delivered the following day. A special effort will be made by postal personnel to keep this mail isolated for speedy handling and dispatch to the respective cities.
