If you are 72 or older and were told you cannot be paid social security benefits because you have not worked long enough, write or call your social security office. Because of the changes in the social security law, you may be able to get a special benefit.

The fact that you are over 65 but still working is no reason not to apply for social security. Applying is the only way you can establish your rights under the new social security law – including your rights to medicare.
