

Stone named FAA chief

Sidney V. Stone has been named chief of the General Aviation Branch of the Flight Standards Division, Federal Aviation Administration Alaskan Region.

The announcement was made today by FAA Alaskan Region Director Lyle K. Brown.

Stone takes over the position formerly held by Samuel A. Lewis who transferred to the FAA's Miami Air Carrier District Office.

Stone began his career with the FAA as a general aviation operations inspector in Fairbanks in February, 1973. In July 1965 he transferred to FAA's Detroit Flight Standards District Office where he served as general aviation operations unit chief. In September, 1974 Stone returned to Alaska with the Juneau Flight Standards District Office and remained in that capacity until his recent appointment in Anchorage.

A pilot, Stone holds an Airline Transport Rating as well as A and P and Flight Engineer license. He served for 12 years as an executive pilot and two years as a USAF flight instructor.

Stone and his wife live in Anchorage.
