Sarah's Major Is Business Administration

By AGNES PETE

Sarah Seeberger, a 22-yearold senior, majoring in business administration, is planning to graduate from the University this month.

An Eskimo from Kotzebue, Sarah has been many places, and found adjustment to the University relatively easy.

She attended school in Kotzebue up to the tenth grade, then transferred to Lathrop High School for her last two years, graduating in 1970.

In Fairbanks she participated in the boarding home program, but was lucky to have her brother as her foster parent. The difference between Kotzebue and Fairbanks, she says is, "one is home, the other isn't."

Adjustment to Lathrop was made easy because she had been to a summer program in Kentucky the summer of her sophomore year in high school.

"It was an intercultural program. Students from all over the U.S. got acquainted with the various backgrounds." She liked it so well, she attended one semester in Kentucky the fall of her junior year.

Sarah also attended Upward Bound, a program for rural students, the summer following her freshman and sophomore years in high school.

"Upward Bound made me realize what I was capable of doing. The program was worth it. Summer is a better time for the program. We got to do more together, and it seemed easier to work with each other."

SARAH SEEBERGER

Photo by ETTA AHKIVGAK

As for transitional problems, she says, "It's easier if the student is willing to accept what's around him. It's up to the student to make it what it is."

(Continued on Page 6)

Seeberger . . .

(Continued from Page 1)

Spending her first quarter of college at Stanford University in Palo Alto, Ca., Sarah became lonesome for Alaska, and transferred to the University.

"I think having the main campus here is better because it is in the center of Alaska. It has better reaching methods; besides, Anchorage is too big for college life."

"Any student should make it a point to stick it through." That is sound advice from a student specializing in marketing, and holding a "B" average.

"A bachelors degree in business administration qualifies you for just about anything in business. I'm interested in bookkeeping or accounting — anything with numbers." Sarah continues.

Next semester she will find a job, then plans to participate in the graduation ceremonies in May.

During the last two years she has also been a tutor for SOS students from rural areas, specializing in tutoring economics and accounting. To be a tutor, one must maintain a "B" average in the area of specialization. She has also worked at a bank downtown part-time the last two years.

Next fall, Sarah would like to go back to school at the University, this time for a masters degree in business administration.