The Alaska Civil Liberties tion, as part of an accelerated mpaign to increase public areness of civil liberties, is initing the distribution of several ousand "What to do if arrest-' cards throughout the state. These cards, which outline in ecific detail the rights and oligations of the arrested pern, will primarily be distributed the young and to members of inority groups, that is, those dividuals most in need of such formation and least likely to we it ahead of time.

In noting the need for the stribution of such information ippler stated, "There is a clear nd continuously demonstrated need in Alaska to inform arrested persons of their rights. Recent Supreme Court decisions have begun to clarify the rights of persons arrested, but changes in the actual procedures of arrest as well as citizen awareness have lagged sadly behind these decisions."

Chief among these recently clarified rights (which have long been granted by the FBI) are the right to know if you are arrested, and the charges against you as well as the right to counsel and the right to silence, according to the ACLU head.

"Actually," Hippler added, such safeguards also work to the advantage of law enforcement agencies as well by leading to more careful police work resulting in better prepared cases, fewer dismissals and thus an increased morale and pride in professionalism among police."
