

Alaska Review looks at liquor industry

The liquor industry, lobbying and the Legislature, and the role of the military in Alaska are the issues that are examined by ALASKA REVIEW in February.

After many years of planning, a brewing industry has been established in Alaska. But all is not smooth sailing for this new industry. Alaska Review takes a look at some of the factors that determine what the thirsty Alaskan may drink, how he gets it, and the price he pays for it.

The legislative lobbyist has alternately been praised and cursed. Alaska Review looks at lobbying and asks what effect this "third house" has on the business of the state.

In the past, the role of the military in Alaska has been economic as well as defensive, but this role is changing. Alaska

Review evaluates some of these changes and asks what the future may hold for the military in the state.

Alaska Review, funded by the Alaska Humanities Forum, is a state-wide television program dealing with issues of concern to Alaskans. Its monthly programs are made available free to television stations across the state.
