Director, National Museum of the American Indian — The Smithsonian Institution invites applications for the position of director of the new National Museum of the American Indian. The museum, which is currently in the planning phase, will have a new facility on the Mall, a storage and study facility in the Washington area, and an exhibition space in New York City. At the heart of the new museum are the Heye Foundation collections, among the most extensive of American Indian and Alaska Native artistic and scholarly programs, will jointly and expand knowledge of the history and culture, contributions and aspirations of the Native peoples of the Americas to the broadest possible audience. In addition to the more traditional responsibilities, the director must be sensitive to the unique relationship between Native American communities and the museum, and develop programs and initiatives to nurture that relationship. The search committee seeks candidates with personal knowledge and experience of American Indian history, culture and contemporary society in their international and hemispheric settings, and with the ability to deal with the full range of institutions which will have a significant impact on the development of the museum. Candidates must also be experienced in planning and management, with the vision and leadership to oversee the development of the museum and its programs as well as the recruitment of a talented staff. Preference will be given to American Indian candidates. For information about the position and application materials, please contact Maureen Robinson, special assistant to recruitment, SI 302, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C. 20560 / (202) 756-2389.
