thereof), and he will proudly admit that his dog is part wolf.

In being told this, I have always asked these people how their dogs got to be part wolf, but none of them have ever really given me a satisfactory answer. Still, not one of them doubts in the least that the blood of the savage wolf flows in his dog's veins. And for proof, they point out such things as their dog's wolfy eyes, the way he carries his tail, or how he digs holes in the yard. These are the more common proofs. I've also heard a few unusual proofs. One fellow on Farmers Loop Road told me he could tell his dog was part wolf because it wouldn't eat Gravy Train. A university student said he figured his dog was part wolf because he couldn't housebreak it. I'm sure all these reasons are valid.

But that still doesn't explain how all these hundreds of dogs in and around Fairbanks got to be part wolf. This question bothered me for a long time until recently when that female wolf wandered into town and was unfortunately hit by a car. I was reading about that and wondering why the female wolf had come to town in the first place when suddenly I realized the answer to both my questions. Why did that female wolf come to town? Because she couldn't find any male wolves out in the woods, that's why. They were all in town messing around with female dogs. That female wolf was hunting for her old man!

This may seem a bit far fetched, but stop and think. All of these Fairbanks dogs had to get their wolf ancestry from somewhere. And isn't it possible that male wolves have a hankering for variety just as do human beings? Personally, I suspect that they like pretty female dogs even more than they like female wolves, because the female wolves are old hat to them. Therefore, all these male wolves hang around the outskirts of Fairbanks, waiting for a chance to sneak into town and make out with some strange, exotic dog. Doesn't that make sense? If anyone has a better theory, I'd like to hear it.

Sincerely,

Ron Crowe
