

ALLAKAKET BOY SCOUTS—Boy Scout Troop 111, Midnight Sun Council from Allakaket, and Troop No. 72, Hughes, visited Fairbanks and survived its urbanized atmosphere last week and came out smiling. Shown are five of the lively native Scouts, some Eskimo, some half Indian and Eskimo boys. Allakaket is the borderline of Eskimo and Indian territories.

—LAEL MORGAN Photo

Allakaket-Hughes Boy Scouts See Adventure Here

FAIRBANKS — Boy Scout Troop No. 111, Midnight Sun Council from Allakaket, and Troop No. 72 of Hughes, completed a daring "Fairbanks Expedition" this week with flying colors.

They've always been good at wilderness work. Made a 500 mile trip up the Koyukuk River last year (becoming the first people to do so in more than five years) and brought an expedition through 50 miles of trailless wilderness on another assignment.

They're such competent outdoor men they're almost casual about survival in Alaska's forboding Arctic, but city life is something else again. Few of them had ever seen a parking meter or a fire alarm, and they had their qualms about using a telephone and dodging traffic.

Last Christmas they received a gift of $125 from Trinity Episcopal School in New Orleans and they decided to invest it in a city trip.

"It was sort of a dream, and a wild one at that," reflects Father Ray Oppenheim, priest in charge of St. John's in the Wilderness Episcopal Mission in Allakaket, who is leader of Troop 111. "The gift was our original nest egg and we didn't know where the rest would come from but we decided we were going to Fairbanks."

To begin with, each boy had

(Continued on page 4)

Allakaket-Hughes Boy Scouts Enjoy Adventure Here

GETTING OFF THE TRAIN—Allakaket-Hughes native Boy Scouts have just gotten off the Alaska Railroad train at College, where the University of Alaska is located, after riding the train from Fairbanks, a four-mile ride.

'BOSSY' GETS ATTENTION—At the University of Alaska experimental farm, Bossy the cow got quite a bit of attention from the native boys of Allakaket and Hughes. They are more familiar with moose and caribou.

(Photos by Lael Morgan)

Allakaket-Hughes...

(Continued from page 1)

to raise $20 which is no mean assignment in a small village with little cash flow.

Was there looting and piracy? "No, but there was some coercion," laughs Oppenheim. "They were packing water and hauling wood. Two of them fed my 10 dogs for eight days while I was in the lower 48. And eventually everybody came up with the money."

Bishop William Gordon Jr. volunteered to pilot the Scouts to Fairbanks in his own small plane. The combined troops numbered 24 plus leader Albert Weeks of Hughes and Oppenheim, so it took several trips.

There were hold-ups because of bad weather and nobody got much sleep, but on Monday everyone had landed at last in Fairbanks.

"Then all sorts of wonderful things began to materialize," Oppenheim recalls. "Fairbanks Native Association found us housing at no expense in their Day Care Center. Eielson gave us a good tour plus a swim in their pool. COMPAS fed us as a gift. Alyeska Pipeline took care of out of pocket expenses and that isn't the first time they've helped our troop."

"KFAR gave us a great tour, even put a couple of the boys on the air and let them play disc jockey. We went through the NASA tracking station, Alaskaland, the University of Alaska Agricultural Station and Musk Ox Farm. The U.S. Army loaned us a bus with a great driver."

The youngsters particularly wanted to see the places where their parents shopped by mail. Lindy's gave them a good tour and passed out candy bars. They got rained out of Alaskaland one morning and on five minutes notice arrived at Penney's which was equally cooperative.

"They rode all the elevators including the freight elevator, explored everything including the heating system and were very impressed with a room full of store manikins," Oppenheim reports.

Things weren't so friendly on the Alaska Railroad. The boys were charged $1 for the four minute ride from Fairbanks to College but they decided the experience might be worth it. Only three of them had ever seen a train before.

Traveling with so many youngsters, aged 10 through 16, was not without problems, of course. There were occasional fist fights and one bloody nose (during a tour of the Tundra Times facility, alas) but self discipline was strong.

For example, three of the boys didn't pay attention to instructions on where to meet the bus after a movie at University of Alaska and showed up almost an hour late.

"They held court marshall on the spot and decided the three would have to buy ice cream for the entire group with a banana split for the bus driver!"

During the week-long stay, the boys averaged less than seven hours sleep nightly but woke up cheerfully each morning at 6:30 in their unheated sleeping quarters.

Asked to list what they liked least about Fairbanks, they put "Going to bed," almost unanimously. Alaskaland and swimming came out as favorite experiences and car and bus rides and television also scored high.

The troops left Sunday for two weeks of Scout Camp at Lost Lake where they'll be learning all they can about water safety.

"Last year a youngster drowned in our river and we don't want it to happen again," Oppenheim explains. "We want our Scout program to help Village life... something beyond the usual Scouting program."

It also seems to be making the lads of the Midnight Sun Council into some of the most sophisticated scouts in the nation. As of this summer they'll be equally at home on land, the tundra, the sea and the city.

NEWSPAPER COLUMNS—The youngsters are learning something about making newspaper columns from Diana Cartier, the newspaper's composer operator. At the top of the picture at right, is Father Ray Oppenheim, Scout Leader of the Allakaket Troop 111 Boy Scouts.

READING TUNDRA TIMES—Two youngsters of the Allakaket-Hughes Boy Scouts rest a moment while reading Tundra Times in the newspaper's office. The spirited youngsters were attentive and curious.