Advertising is more than selling blank space on a page, it is what keeps a newspaper going. At the Tundra Times, that job revolves around one person — Michael Chase.

Michael has been the advertising manager for the Tundra Times for more than three years.

In 1988 the Tundra Times made one of its biggest decisions — not to sell advertisements promoting alcohol. It was a big step for the paper and one that put pressure on Michael.

With the help of caring organizations and Michael's creativity, however, that decision has turned space that would have promoted liquor, to advertisements that promote traditional values, safety in the workplace and avoidance of alcohol.

Michael's skills have always been an asset to the Tundra Times. In 1987 he won a second place award for best design from the Society of Professional Journalists and recently he received a first place award for best advertising idea from the Native American Press Association.

Advertising is not Michael's only skill. He received his bachelor of arts degree in art from the University of Alaska Fairbanks and often adds to the paper through artwork and graphics. On certain nights he can be found behind a drum set for "Key Grip," an Anchorage rock'n'roll group that plays the classics.

One of the reasons Michael excels in Alaskan advertising is that he has lived in communities as small as Mekoryuk and as large as Fairbanks and Anchorage.

Michael is one reason we're still going strong.
