

Egan: Background Ably Equips Him—

Carter in Fisheries Entry Commission

JUNEAU — Governor William A. Egan recently announced the appointment of Harry Carter, of Anchorage, to the state's Commercial Fisheries Entry Commission.

Carter fills a vacancy left on the commission by the resignation of David Jackman last July. His term runs to July 1, 1975.

Egan noted that Carter formerly was a commercial fisherman in Kodiak and has a bachelor's degree in biological science.

"This background ably equips him to lend valuable assistance in meeting the commission's challenging task," the governor said.

The commission currently is completing public hearings on proposed regulations to determine eligibility for fishing in 21 of Alaska's salmon fisheries.

The commission was established under legislation adopted by the Alaska Legislature in 1973.

The purpose of the program is to stabilize the number of units of fishing gear in Alaska's various fisheries so that sound biological fisheries management can be accomplished which will enable fishermen to realize adequate incomes of their efforts.

Carter was born and raised in Fort Yukon and has lived in Fairbanks, Nome, Kodiak and Anchorage. He has served on the State-Federal Land Use Planning Commission, as a state member appointed by the governor, since July, 1972. He now will resign the post.

Carter graduated from high school in Fairbanks and attended Albion College in Michigan and the University of Utah before completing his degree at the University of Alaska in 1959.

He is a former officer on Kon-iag, Inc., the Kodiak regional corporation established under provisions of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, and formerly was executive director of the Alaska Federation of Natives.

He and his wife, Nancy, have four children.

Other members of the Commercial Fisheries Entry Commission are Roy Rickey, of Juneau, and Charles J. Stovall, of Dillingham.
