How to work your way up from the top.

He might be a student leader at Alaska Methodist University, but the girl from Sheldon Jackson thinks some of his theories are pretty silly. And says so.

It happens at the College Leadership Institutes sponsored on a regular basis by the Humble Education Foundation. And the last session, involving thirteen campus representatives from four Alaskan colleges and universities, was no exception.

The "Leadership Lab", as it is often called by participants, provides a rough, instructive weekend session, during which the young thinkers divide into teams and tackle the kinds of problems they'll face in business or the professions. Each team periodically submits its "solutions" to the judgment of the entire group. That's when sparks -- and ideas -- start to fly.

It's not a new idea. Humble has been sponsoring these institutes for years. But because of distances involved, Alaskans have been unable to join in -- until this year, when Humble helped find a way to cover travel costs to the Lower 48, where the Alaskans joined over 100 fellow students from throughout the Pacific Northwest.

These young leaders discovered a unique opportunity to get some advance training in the art of leadership before they interview for that first job.

Humble is pleased to be able to help provide Alaskans with that opportunity.
