

Scottish Earl Is Reader of Tundra Times

By George Jeannings Gale

Tundra Times is quite a famous paper. Oil workers in Iran, or Persia, are reading it as well as a Scottish Earl in the New Hebrides—this paper graces his great oak table in the lonely old castle that stands at the headlands much like a lighthouse—and which has been a landmark for 800 years or so.

A shepherd in Nevada, after reading the Tundra Times, uses it once a week to show the way for the weekly supply train to reach his camp. He uses the well-read and worn newspaper to light a greasewood fire to show the people in Paradise Valley where he is camped in the hills that night.
