Alyeska Pipeline donates funds for Native education

Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. has given $108,850 to the University of Alaska Fairbanks to support education and outreach programs for Alaska Native students statewide.

UAF's rural development program, the UAF Rural Alaska Honors Institute (RAHI) and UAF's Tanana Valley Campus (TVC) will each receive about $35,000. The funds will be used to support scholarships for Alaska Native students.

The rural development department at UAF, which offers programs focusing on communitybased research and cultural arts documentation, local government administration, land and renewable resources, small business management as well as community service and organization, will provide scholarships for two Alaska Native students.

The rural development program offers classes at the Fairbanks campus, UAF's five branch campuses and throughout the state with its field-based program for students in rural communities.

The field-based program, which combines at-home study with attendance at special seminars, currently enrolls 19 students from communities as far away as Unalaska and Chevak.

RAHI, the summer academic program for college-bound, primanily Alaska Native rural high school students, will use the Alyeska donation to support a new academic focus in petroleum engineering. Funds will also provide additional support for the already-existing business management program.

Full RAHI scholarships will be offered to students choosing either of these program areas. According to RAHI Director Jim Kowalsky, Alyeska hopes to increase its recruitment of Alaska Natives into its workforce by supporting UAF's (907) 474-6886 or 1-800-478college bridging program. 6886. RAHI students take classes and Alaska Native students are also live on the Fairbanks campus, reeligible to apply for an Alyeska ceiving college credit for their studscholarship at the Tanana Valley ies in math, English and other ar-Campus. Scholarships will be eas. Students in the program are awarded based on student need and selected based on demonstrated acaare available for the 1996 spring, demic achievement, leadership and summer or fall semester. Recipia strong interest in earning a baccaents can use their scholarship for laureate degree. A grade point avtuition, books and/or living expenses while enrolled full-time in erage of 3.0 or higher is required. Information and student applione of TVC's technical or vocacations for RAHI is being sent to tional programs. Application forms all rural schools. and more information are available For more information contact at the TVC Student Developmen-Kowalsky or Denise Wartes at tal Center (907) 451-7223.