out of storage for her trip to Denver (to represent Smoke Signals) where the temperature obligingly dropped to an unaccustomed (to Denverites) -12 degrees.

The harsh degrees of opinion among Indians in the lower 48 impressed Alaskan (Tlingit) Jim Thomas in his work during the year with NCAI.

Without the Alaskan Native's buffer of the land, there emerges adamant frustrated Indian people, tired of white overlords, with others afraid or unwanting to replace the status quo.

What ever the Indian input will be into the press, the Indian Press Association is designed to help improve the quality of the Indian press.

According to its goals, the IPA will serve as a center for information on improving the mechanics of the Indian press, supplying them with Indian-oriented news and feature materials.

It hopes to find some means of quickly disseminating stories on the style of AP and UPI.

Among its goals are the intentions to provide interpretations of information affecting Indian people, act as go-between for Indian groups with the mass media, a spur to push Indian youth into the journalism and communications fields.

Formation of the IPA began in Spokane, Washington in July, 1970 at a feasibility conference attended by a group of interested editors of Indian newspapers. The first meeting was sponsored by the American Indian Development, Inc. (AID), a non-profit organization centered in Denver.

During Phase I of the plan devised at this meeting, Indian editors divided the U.S. into seven regions to survey the Indian press.

Their findings were reported at a second meeting in September, 1970, in Durango, Colorado. They presented their plans to the convention of the National Congress of American Indians in Anchorage, October 19-23.

With enthusiastic support from the NCAI, the IPA organized formally in San Francisco. Initial funding from the Bureau of Indian Affairs if financing a Denver office and a permanent staff headed by Charles Trumble.

During the next year, the IPA plans a pilot workshop for editors of Indian newspapers in Denver this spring. If this workshop goes well, it plans further workshops at various locations around the country and research into the feasibility of setting up an information network.
